. . elite and the system, is obviously connected to the turn of the nineteenth century. The term itself was coined in the 1870s, and the first populist party the People's Party in Austria, was established in the late 1880s. It became quite a substantial force in Austrian politics after World War I, as well as in Poland, Hungary, Romania and Italy. Hungarian and Polish populisms have been defined as major threats to the integrity of the . . . nation and the European Union.. . . The German version of populism entered into our debates mainly in the 1980s, when the Social Democratic Party entered into alliance with the neo-fascists of the new right. On the other hand, populism is also associated with the politics of the left in the Western world.` Populism is a political philosophy based on resentment and anxiety, which seeks to restore the stability and order of the political system in the face of elite corruption, elite economic crisis and elite violence.` In the way in which we used populism in the context of EU exit, we identified a variety of populist tendencies. Pessimism is a mood related to the . . . experience of the crisis. Liberal ideas are associated with some of these cases of political pessimism. Populism often emerges on the left, from Communists and anarchists, but sometimes it is the right, for instance in Italy."[^4] After outlining the populisms and related tendencies that have emerged as such in the past decade, Riedel argues that populist leaders in Europe tend to be very political entrepreneurs. Populism and nationalism are often articulated together. Populism is often articulated as belonging to one or the other political camp, but is also articulated as a transcending or transcending of the party system. In fact, the term has some problems with respect to its definition in the real world. For example, some political parties that have led the `no` campaign in a referendum of the EU have tried to be populists, while at the same time remaining within the system. Populism is most likely to arise among the more frustrated in society, who are least satisfied with what the economy and politics do for them. This is precisely the opposite of what was said by Pippa Norris at the beginning of the EU debate, who argued that people are more satisfied with the workings of the system than they were with the system itself.
